REVIEW

The Vedanta Kesari — Madras January 1956

It is an anthology of great thoughts uttered by the world's master-minds who lived in God and showed the way. The author, habituating himself to 'communion with God during a few moments set apart everyday' which he calls God's Moments has felt an 'exaltation of soul' and rose 'above the trivialities and unsubstantialities of our earthly existence' and he discovered 'beyond doubt that God is and that faith is not mental slavery or sluggishness, t a potent Power to realize the Infinite'. Translating thoughts into words, he has put on record these ings of his soul from out of which he has extracted a ection which forms Part I of the book. Written in verse, they make a direct and effective appeal to and stimulate the spirit. Consecration, Thy will and An Appeal to Death, to take but three of the Part II of the book called The Prayers, Poems and Thoughts of the Great is a well chosen anthology culled from the writings and sayings of poets, philosophers and saints, calculated to lift the reader from whatever is sordid and sad, to help him to contemplate on whatever is true, noble and of good import and admit him to the company of the world's immortals. Great and holy men of many countries and many periods have been pressed into service in this collection. Pictures of many of these personages adorn its pages.

In modern times, the common man has lost the art of living in solitude and of communion with the Spirit by meditation and silent prayer. To those who would wish to habituate themselves to the practice of such meditation for ever so short a while every day, this book would provide much to dwell upon to chasten their minds and attune their souls.
